Advice has been sought and included from audiologists, others with a loss, hearing associations, and friends. The result is a beginning introduction to the difficulties faced, their reasoning, and the direction one can take to receive help or to improve their communication. It was written with audiologist offices, doctors, consumers with hearing difficulties, and the general public in mind. Communication problems can place stress on relationships. As serious as it is to have communication difficulties because of hearing loss, there also are times when laughter is the best medicine. I have been Jo Bailey's audiologist for many years, and I find her humor is a way to release some of the stress hearing loss has on communication. I hope you find this collection of stories of misunderstandings helpful as a way to find some humor in a rather serious issue. -William Holzhaeuser, AuD, Ashland Audiology, LLC

The author has had a serious hearing loss since the age of six, but never realized it because in retrospect she invented her own version of what she misheard in order to stay in touch with the world. This was discovered when in her Master's program in Speech and Hearing Therapy. She had operations for connecting the middle ear bones and wore good hearing aids for years. There is a sincere desire to share this experience with any who have such difficulty or wish to know how to guide a partner or friend who appears to need help with their hearing.

Very entertaining little book
